85 min, Canada, 2014, English, Colour, HD

LOGLINE

After years in a loving home, Jon, a toy, was forgotten, deserted and betrayed by his adoptive mother. He returns to live a sad life as a worker on the line in a factory where hundreds of cabbage babies are born every day.

REEL SUSPECTS

SHORT SYNOPSIS

Jon is just another mindless laborer on an assembly line, but at no ordinary factory. Day after day he and his fellow drones harvest kids from cabbages – kids that will go on to become the beloved toys of little boys and girls in the land outside this dreadful factory. But when Jon discovers the awful secret that he and all the indentured workers are actually grown-up and discarded toys, he'll have to take on a villainous corporation to reunite with his long-lost mother, protect his newfound family, and finally find freedom.

LONG SYNOPSIS

Inspired by the award-winning short film of the same name, Patch Town tells the story of Jon, an abandoned toy who has lived a sad life as an oppressed worker at a factory where hundreds of cabbage babies are born. Work on the assembly line is a thankless task of shucking, picking, and processing new-borns to go out into the world and to their new adoptive mothers. Each new birth gradually takes its toll on Jon and he slips deeper into sadness, lamenting the days when life was good and he was loved.

Yuri, the evil child catcher who rules over Patch Town and the factory, discovers the baby that Jon and his wife, Mary, have stolen, which forces Jon to make the decision to escape the authoritarian city and find a safe home for his family.

REEL SUSPECTS

Jon and his family manage to escape with the help of his new friend, Sly, who helps him find work in the big city as a seasonal holiday worker. With Sly's advice on the dos and don'ts of surviving in the human world, Jon builds a safe place for his family but it isn't enough. He wants to find his adoptive mother who abandoned him so long ago.

When Yuri finds out that Jon and his family have escaped, he sets out to kidnap the one person who will bring them back, his adoptive mother, Bethany. But things go awry when Bethany's daughter is kidnapped instead.

With newfound courage, Jon returns to Patch Town with his family to save his mother and her daughter, his new sister, and while doing so, rescues the other oppressed factory workers and sets them free. Suddenly faced with the opportunity to live with his adoptive mother, Jon must choose where his home and heart belong.

DIRECTORS' STATEMENT

Patch Town. It is a dark comedy, adventure. Asked if he thought his first feature film directorial debut was ambitious Craig, replied "I'd rather die on a fence too high than live under one too low."

He was not afraid to try something bold and shoot for the moon with this film, and he can confidently admit he believes he has successfully done that.

Recognizing that Patch Town is unlike anything else out there, Producer David Sparkes concurs and says, "We really wanted to push the limits. We like high concept, something that is interesting and that engages people of all ages."

The idea for Patch Town had been incubating for eight years before going to camera. It was born out of a conversation about where babies come from that Craig had on set with a script supervisor. In North American folklore the stork delivers babies but in Eastern European folklore, Babies are born in the cabbage patch. It was that idea that propelled Craig to explore the notion of Nostalgia and ponder the idea of abandonment and hope.

All along Craig's hope and intention was to make a feature film on the Patch Town story. He acknowledges that making the short film for BravoFACT! Helped to get the story out there and was the encouragement he needed to pursue making the feature. "It's such a crazy interesting story that we wanted to tell, that we needed to give it a sense of what the story was before we dove into it," he said about making the short first.

Patch Town, the short film, won the Director's Guild Award for Best Short in 2012 and screened at the Cannes Short Film Corner and premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival in September 2011, and went on to premiere at the Sarasota Film Festival and the Palm Springs International Film Festival.

The feature film has allowed Craig to explore the story and the characters and elaborate with more in-depth development.

While it's not often that actors get to reprise their role from a short film to a feature, but for Rob Ramsay, who played Jon in the short and who becomes the hero in the feature, it was a chance to examine the character's complexity a bit more. Although it wasn't difficult for Rob to bring back the character of Jon, he found this time around he could more closely relate to him, he says, "It's not hard to bring back the character. I really relate to him now in terms of finding out who he is and what he's searching for – home and family. I'm at a stage in my life where I'm thinking about the future and all that it could entail and where my career will take me. Trying to figure out who I am and where I want to be, which is exactly what is happening to Jon."

REEL SUSPECTS

For actress Zoie Palmer, the short film offered her a chance to see the world of Patch Town ahead of stepping on set and into the role of Bethany. Seeing the director's vision and story on screen in advance is not common, as Zoie explains, "It almost never happens! When I watched it I was completely engaged by the bizarre world that I was drawn in right away. I wanted to know more about every character."

Re-casting some of the familiar faces from the short to the feature was not only an important thread to tie some footage from the short into the feature but also why change something that already works. Craig asked Julian, Rob and Ken Hall, who plays Kenny, to reprise their roles. On casting Julian, Craig says, "Our first cast was Julian. He's not only an incredibly talented individual but he also had the exact look for the child catch we were looking for."

As an industry veteran who has worked on big budget Hollywood tent pole films to micro-budget indie films and shorts, Julian makes it a point to work with emerging filmmakers. When the script landed in front of him, he knew Patch Town was a different kind of project.

He also recognized that Craig had a very specific vision and sensibility for the film, he says, "Craig's not emerging, he's here. There's a breath of vision and scope that you don't often see with an emerging voice. The shooting process has been very specific, very tight and he's always shooting to edit. If he's got what he needs, he moves on and doesn't waste footage. He has been very clear about how big he wants it, how orchestrated he wants it, sound and visually. There are not many films where you can come in, shoot for a day, and you go wow, there were elements of Stanley Kurbick, the Wizard of Oz and Disney movies from the 70s – not as a token reference but somebody who’s absorbed these reference and using them creatively.”

Rob auditioned for the role of Jon at a cold casting call for the short film. Craig saw something special in Rob as soon as he walked in the door, he suggests, “Rob is the new John Candy. I think the industry has been missing someone like that. We don’t have many big men who have such a level of sincerity and sweetness about them. Truly, Rob brings a sweetness and levity to a very dark story.

For Rob Ramsay, the chance to work with Julian again has been one of the highlights of his career, he says, “Julian is one of the most brilliant and talented actors I’ve ever worked with. I idolize actors like him, they have over 150 credits and they work all the time. That’s what I’d like to do.”

In the universe that Craig created, a world that Julian describes as “a wonderland that’s gone wrong with elements of pure wonder and magic; of a toy makers shop that has suddenly become oppressive and evil, of beautiful dolls and creations that start living under fear, of a western idea of fantasy and consumer bliss that can easily be twisted into oppression,” is in essence one that clearly demonstrates the balance of light and dark.

Not afraid to explore the dark shadows of the story or while shooting, Craig explains, “To truly explore darkness you need light and it’s in those moments of levity that give us our darkness. It’s the dark shadows that we’re really fascinated by – we want to see deep into them and what lives in them. But, we see our way through to moments of light and once we get to there it sheds light on everything dark that lived there.”

REEL SUSPECTS

Even though Director of Photography, Guy Godfree, hadn't done a feature film prior to Patch Town, Craig knew that he was the artist who could paint the picture that he had created in his mind. He says, "Guy did just that. We shot exactly how I visualized it in my head and that's a wonderful experience. We realize that we have something special here and it looks absolutely beautiful."

In Guy, Craig found a director of photography who was comfortable with shadows and darkness, which was crucial to the film, as Craig mentions, "the darkness is a character in this film, and so is the shadow. With Guy I was able to maintain this darkness. The key is not being afraid if someone's line dips into darkness – they will come out to the light on the other end."

It's that ability to move through the spaces that was also important to production designer Matt Middleton, who also comes with Craig from the short film, and who remember being completely intrigued about the story when Craig first told him about it at a backyard barbeque over three years ago.

He didn't have to look far for inspiration, Matt says, "We're all big fans of movies like City of Lost Children and Terry Gilliam's Brazil. But at the same time, while those were inspirations, we're also very much into doing our own thing. Craig had a very specific vision. To capture the dark, grayness of the Patch Town world, we started looking at a lot of references, like Victorian orphanages and factories, and Russian posters and iconography. Once these things entered our mind, they began to form the basis and foundation for Patch Town."

Creativity wasn't constrained by budget, but locations were. Matt's challenge was to take the skeletons of locations and create the idealized worlds of the toy maker's workshop or the evil child catcher's liar. With a set heavy film, the film had to maximize production value. When a location became available and fit in the indie production budget, Craig adapted the script slightly to fit the sets within the location.

For Craig it was about designing the frame and building layers. To achieve the layers, Matt put his efforts into a few specific areas and pieces to allow them to shine and draw the audience attention, that way it lets them focus on specific props while covering a lot of ground.

Matt's key pieces included Gregor's workshop and the baby conversion machine. By its design it laid the foundation for the magic that takes place in Patch Town where the babies are found in the forest and turned into dolls. Matt explains, "The baby conversion machine was made to look Victorian hand crafted. It's powered by steam, gears and pulleys, and it's got hand operator bellows with dials and switches."

One of Matt's favorite design elements was the Russian detailing throughout Patch Town, that are things which might be easily passed over. He provides the outhouse as an example; "we really wanted to strike some Russian character into the outhouse so we researched Russian architecture and woodworking and brought those finishing details to the exterior trim." A sci-fi prop in the modern incarnation of Patch Town, the re-education machine, was another favorite piece of Matt's. The machine sits on a person's head, with flashing monitors and smoke coming out while wiping clean the memory of the person and brainwashing them. When a production films exterior shots in January in Toronto, a crew must expect the unpredictable weather. However, it's as if the weather gods had the shooting schedule and just when the scene called for snow, it snowed, and when it called for the same snow several weeks later, it snowed the same kind of cinematic fluffy snow. A priceless production value that David calls serendipitous, acknowledging how very lucky they were that the weather gods were on their side.

In the same vein that a small budget didn't inhibit creativity in production design, it also propelled the wardrobe to do the same. Led by veteran costume designer, Georgina Yarhi, the costumes also had that same visual sensibility. Like Matt, Georgina worked on the short film so had laid the groundwork and tone for the feature. “She’s been able to bring to the film a clear and consistent genius to how it all works,” said Craig of Georgina’s work. She understands that Bethany’s wardrobe of light, bright clothes in solid colours was required to counter the dark backgrounds and shadows in Patch Town. It is the way that the real world is bright; a brightness that is magnified through Jon’s perspective when he escapes from the somber world of Patch Town and experiences colour for the first time. Georgina wasn’t confined to one particular time period. Although the real world was contemporary, the characters in Patch Town are not restricted to one style. This freedom allowed for Georgina to create costumes for the characters of Patch Town that are suspended in time.

SILVIO AMATO , composer, Borrowing from the classical fairy tales he has scored like Peter Pan, Beauty and the Beast and The Happy Prince, Silvio's life has its own magical quality. When he was four years old his father brought home "a piece of furniture", a piano, to occupy an empty space in the family living room. This very piano became the center of the life of a self-taught, musically gifted child. The seemingly accidental first encounter with the piano set the stage for an almost whimsical life of musical achievement and recognition in his native Italy. From ballet to ice shows, from writing the scores for Italy's top grossing movies to catching the popular ear with a song that recently won the Italian version of American Idol, Silvio has composed the music that has captured the vibrancy of a romantic, and very cultured contemporary Italy. Recently, Silvio received one of his "highest" honors as he was commissioned by the Catholic Church to write an opera with the purpose of bringing together the musical themes of Catholicism, Judaism, and Islam. This challenge, with all of its historical significance, marks another bright spot in a very luminous career.

With a full staff in Milan to manage the business of his very prolific career, Silvio has embarked on what he calls his "new adventure". He has moved his entire family to Boston so he can be near his daughter while she attends college while, at the same time, he can enjoy and contribute to America. Silvio's ability to work simultaneously in two countries is made possible by his mastery of computer technology. His technical skills have served to enhance his creativeness as he has truly become a modern artist and, in every sense of the word, a "renaissance" man of today. Whether a project calls for a strict classical approach, with full orchestration or virtual, computer generated music, or a mix of the two, Silvio's musical and technical proficiency allows him to meet a client's taste and cost needs. His virtual symphonic scores represent the intersection of human and technical capability at the highest level and are perfectly timed for the efficiency driven new economy. It is this adaptability along with an uncharacteristic humility in the face boundless talent that places him in his own category and sets a new and welcome standard in a very competitive industry.

Patch Town editor JEREMY LALONDE had already won the Lighthouse Festival Theatre's Young Playwright's Award three times, in addition to having won an Award of Excellence and Outstanding Production award in the Sear's Drama Festival. Shifting focus from the theatre to film, Jeremy studied film and television at Niagara College (he would later return as a visiting professor) where he made his award-winning short film Selfless, Cold, & Composed.

In the summers between school years he co-founded the Ontario Visual Heritage Project an award winning documentary series that explores the history of Ontario. Though he has stepped away from it, the project continues to be produced and parts of it air on TVO. After moving Toronto, Jeremy has kept busy in the film and television industry working as an editor for films, Bolly Double, starring Sitara Hewitt, Saturday, starring Carlos Diaz and Tony Nappo, and television series including Carlawood, featuring Carla Collins and Ty Power Jr., as well as the Gemini award-winning Princess, Wipeout Canada, and You Gotta Eat Here. As the goal has always been to work on his own projects, Jeremy wrote and directed the awardwinning short film Mrs. & Mrs. Moosewood followed up by his award-winning short film for Bravo!, Hoff's New Direction, before directing his first feature film, The Untitled Work of Paul Shepard. It has screened internationally at film festivals and was given a limited theatrical run in Canada, in addition to playing on Super Channel. In 2011 Jeremy was nominated for Best Director at the Canadian Comedy Awards, in addition to being recognized by the Toronto International Film Festival in 2010 with the Irving Avrich Award for Emerging Talent in Canadian Film. Jeremy's second feature Sex After Kids is currently on the film festival circuit and he is in development on a slate of television and feature film projects.
